Long Synopsis:

Twenty-something couple Siobhan and Sean are living together and haven't really noticed the last seven years pass them by. As Siobhan finishes her PhD in particle physics and Sean continues to struggle to find a foothold as a fine art photographer, they've fallen into a rut that they've avoided confronting. Until now. Siobhan has an opportunity that would move her across the ocean to Europe and she is reluctant to take it. But, when her sister gets engaged, Sean and Siobhan begin to ask if they can see themselves taking the next step together, too. As Sean and Siobhan fight to give their relationship a chance, they realize that they've been holding back from pursuing their dreams to their fullest. Siobhan decides to apply for a post-doctoral research position at the European Organization for Nuclear Research (CERN) and Sean finds companionship in his friendship with a fellow photographer, and potential romantic flame, DD. They find themselves fighting more regularly until they can't take it anymore and break-up.

When Sean and Siobhan break-up, they find it hard to adjust as they realize they have a lot to learn as newly single people. They find comfort in new romantic partners but continue to miss each other as new accomplishments come their way. As the months roll by and they lean into their professional achievements, Siobhan's sister asks if Sean can shoot her wedding. Sean and Siobhan know they will be forced to face each other again and decide how they ultimately feel about each other. Will their time apart strengthen their bond or confirm that are not meant to be together? Can they pursue their dreams and go back to what they had? Taking place over the course of a year, Sean and Siobhan learn that sometimes moving forward means going in opposite directions.
